There is a fruit, rapidly coming into favor in this country, about which even the experts in such matters seem to know little. They are all ready enough with onlinens and search know little. They are all ready enough with opinions, and scarcely any two of them are of the same opinion. Some of them call it grape fruit, some forbidden fruit, some pommelo, others shaddock, by which name it is generally known. It belongs to the citrus family, and a sea captain, one Shaddock, is supposed to have found it in the Malay and Pelyponesian islands, whence he introduced it to the West Indies. It looks like a big, smooth orange, though it is of a paler yellow than most oranges. In taste it suggests a cross between an orange and a temon, with a little bitter thrown in. Out in half acroes the cell walls and eaten with a spoon it is the most refreshing of fruit. The shaddock is now largely cultivated in Florida.
